Customize appearance

Obie Trice Video Has Cameo By A Shady-Looking Eminem

'Got Some Teeth' is rapper's first single for Em's Shady Records.

By archive-Joseph-Patel

By archive-Joseph-Patel

August 11, 2003 / 8:18 PM

Obie Trice is not a complicated man. After growing up in the harshness of Detroit's inner city and now living in the warm embrace of his Shady Records family, Obie has a very simple request when it comes to his women: have some teeth.

In the video for his song "Got Some Teeth," his debut single on Shady Records, Obie goes on a fruitless search for a woman with, um, bite. The video was helmed by Obie's musical mentor, Eminem, and Philip G. Atwell, the directorial right-hand man to Eminem and Dr. Dre.

In the clip, Obie is a contestant on the game show "Dream Date," a send up of "Blind Date." On the first of three blind dates, Obie meets a woman at a club and woos her with drinks. The bartender serving up shots and beers is none other than Eminem, nearly unrecognizable in his bar-back regalia: dark hair, an open shirt, hairy chest and a handlebar moustache befitting a porn star.

This being the fantasy land of rap videos, Obie's date instantly heads back to the hotel with him. The next morning, though, Obie mournfully discovers her false fronts lying in a glass of water. No teeth equals bad date. Date number two is nearly as disappointing when Obie is cornered by a gaggle of Obie-hating girls outside a club.

On date number three a clearly frustrated Obie Trice drinks so much that he mistakes some healthy, full-figured women for skinny model types. His friends toss him in a cab and the cab driver turns out to be a stunning, dark-haired female cutie who goes back to his hotel with him. The next morning, when he rolls over, he realizes he's been had again: fake teeth in the water glass.

"Got Some Teeth" is the first video from Obie's upcoming Shady Records debut, Cheers, due in September.